TKI open 23_kippen tipping

Much of what seemed stable for a long time eventually starts to tip. Or we make it tip: windows can tip, lakes, gymnasts at the bar.

Tipping points are diverse: climate researchers warn about them, Time Magazine announced a Transgender Tipping Point and in construction mechanics you get beauties like lateral torsional buckling. What they all have in common is tipping: Whatever loses its balance may continue this way or that, but not as before. Whether it will be better, worse, both, or simply different afterwards, we can rarely glimpse before we reach tipping point.

But if it does not go on just like before, then this crisis, this essential, irreversible, tipping/swaying/tumbling may become grounds for hope and a source of renewal. When something established tips, people are at last able to see it and their mutual relations from a new angle.

TKI open 23_kippen encourages you to take such a new look and asks: What do we deliberately want to tip over, tilt away and flip into its better opposite? Which toggle switch to press? What will it be like once we are beyond the tipping point? How do we prepare for it, how will we care for each other then? TKI open 23_kippen is an invitation to initiatives and artists to fearlessly tip over into a thinking and an action that allows everything to become possible in a different way than before.
